American Cancer Society Partners with Curing Kids Cancer to Raise Funds for Pediatric Cancer

ATLANTA, Sept. 16, 2016 /PRNewswire-USNewswire/ -- The American Cancer Society today announced the launch of a new initiative, "A House United to Tackle Pediatric Cancer™" in collaboration with Atlanta-based charity Curing Kids Cancer. The program targets college football fans this season through 12 of IMG's partner universities to raise awareness and funds for childhood cancer. "A House United to Tackle Pediatric Cancer" will bring together college football coaches and ambassadors from across the country to ask fans to help raise funds for pediatric cancer programs and research.

Pediatric cancer is the second leading cause of death among children ages 1-14 in the United States. The American Cancer Society estimates that in 2016, there will be 10,380 new cancer cases diagnosed among children in the United States.

"As the Society continues to work with the sports industry to fund cancer research and create world class cancer prevention initiatives, we are proud to expand our sports strategy to mobilize a new audience within college football to help save lives from childhood cancer," said Sharon Byers, Chief Development Officer, American Cancer Society.

Through this collaboration, the American Cancer Society and Curing Kids Cancer will jointly determine allocation of all proceeds from the initiative to support research and programs for pediatric cancer.

"By supporting this campaign, college football teams and coaches are ultimately helping Curing Kids Cancer and the American Cancer Society fund the development of life saving treatments for childhood cancers," said Grainne Owen, founder of Curing Kids Cancer. "As a mother who lost her child to cancer, seeing these partnerships become a reality and knowing what they can help us achieve, means more than anyone can possibly imagine!"

The 12 universities currently participating are:

College football fans can donate or fundraise directly to their school's campaign and spread the word through their networks to help raise awareness and funds. Corporations, companies, schools, and community groups can also join this initiative to work together for a single purpose of defeating pediatric cancer.

"This partnership with the American Cancer Society will create an incredible platform for A House United to Tackle Pediatric Cancer to bring a very important message to the passionate collegiate sports audience," said Andrew Judelson, Executive Vice President, Sales and Marketing, IMG College. "These 12 universities are making an impact well beyond the playing field, and they are leading the way for the support of pediatric cancer research and programs."
